Cole's, inventor of the French Dip sandwich and the oldest public house in Los Angeles, is established by entrepreneur Harry Cole and housed in the hollow of the Pacific Electric Building, once the center of transit tycoon Henry Huntington's Railway network. At its peak, 100,000 passengers passed through the city's vital transportation hub daily, many of them stopping to partake of Cole's delicious French dips and a pint.

Jack Garlinghouse, Cole's house chef, dips bread in Au Jus to soften it for a customer with bad gums. Thus, he originates the French Dip sandwich, a universally beloved Los Angeles Culinary invention.

Cole's sells a record fifty-eight 32-gallon kegs, or 19,000 gallons of beer the first day California lifted the ban on beer, signaling the beginning of the end of Prohibition.

Cole's is designated by the City of Los Angeles as Historical Landmark Site #104 and a State Point of Historical Interest not only for its location, but also for recognizing Cole's to be the true Inventor of the French Dip sandwich. There, that settles that.

Mickey Cohen, infamous gangster, bookie czar and Cole's regular reigned from the 1930's until his death from natural causes. Ask to be seated at his table.

Jimmy Barela, who joined Cole's in 1918, retires after working as our lead barman for 65 years. Thanks Jimmy for your loyalty and contribution to Cole's legacy.

Pouring With Heart, a driving force in Los Angeles urban revival, reopens Cole's after a careful, loving $1.6 million year-long restoration.

Cole's is named a 2009 recipient of the Los Angeles Conservancy's coveted Preservation Award, recognizing outstanding achievement in the field of historic preservation.
